Lysosomal storage disorders (LSD) are a group of hereditary inborn errors of metabolism that affect the transport of lysosomal enzymes to the lysosome. Accumulation of undigested and unprocessed macromolecules in LSD is one of the key features of the disease. Enzymes that are catabolized in the lysosome are sorted for transport in the biosynthetic pathways by molecular recognition. The mechanism of this sorting step and the intracellular pathways that are involved in targeting the enzymes to the lysosome are the focus of this review.

Recent studies with the lysosomal enzyme gal

children and adolescents (aged 6-17 years) diagnosed with asthma by medical experts. We studied the impact of gender, age, disease severity, medications, and asthma control on HRQOL. We evaluated 230 children and adolescents with asthma. Overall mean HRQOL scores were  $73.0 \pm 20.1$  (n=230). HRQOL was correlated with age (P.05). HRQOL was lower in children with severe asthma (P.05) or gender (P>.05). In children with asthma, HRQOL was correlated with age, asthma control, and asthma
