reveals a novelty of microbial communities inhabiting a Desulfovibrio acoerologenic biofilter. A biofilter was developed to treat a petrochemical wastewater that had been previously dewatered in a laboratory biofiltration unit. Part of the wastewater was treated by a spiral biofilter unit equipped with an electrochemical oxidation (ECO) cell as anodic electrode. A polymeric material (cellulose acetate, or CAC) and natural zeolite were used to support the biofilter growth. The biofilter showed high removal efficiency (>98%) of organic micropollutants (n-alkanes and 2,2',4,6-tetrachloro-4'-methyl-1,4-diphenyl-1,3-cyclohexadiene -dimethanol). Total microbial communities were monitored in the biofilter through sampling of solutions and biofilms. Overall, 18 operational taxonomic units (OTUs) were retrieved from the culture-independent method, and genotypic analysis showed a predominance of the Desulfovibrio genus. The community analysis showed that the OTUs retrieved were related to known Desulfovibrio species, and it was observed that the bacteria belonged to the family Desulfovibrionaceae. A novel biocatalytic activity by an EcO-Desulfovibrio symbiont was discovered, and the mechanism was first described here. The strain showed a strong ability to degrade
