"There's no sugarcoating it, white people have privileges that black people don't have." Lee said after the screening of the documentary and special screening at a Harlem church Friday night. "The message is to say to black people, we'll be with you. We'll be there with you. We will listen." Lee, who also wrote the script for "Bamboozled," said he is aware of the long history of racial oppression that black people endure and is committed to changing the current climate of the racial climate of the United States. "White Like Me," which was screened before the Harlem community, explores some of the issues black Americans face, including employment, education and the criminal justice system. While the film makes it clear that white people are not the only race that suffers from discrimination, he said, his point was that there is an inherent racism in the system. "If you look at the history of any nation, any kind of nation, if you look at the history, white people were the first slaves," Lee said. "And they have been the slave-owners, the colonizers, the exploiters, the oppressors and they continue to be the oppressors. It's been a long history, it's a difficult history." In the film, the narration says that racism is the "scourge of the world," and shows it running through society. "My job is to look at it and say, what can we do about it, what can I do about it?" Lee said. Lee said he had not heard complaints about the film, though he was surprised that there were no protests. Some may argue that the film goes too far in its critique of race 2d92ce491b
