Louis de Coubertin Gristmill Historic District The Louis de Coubertin Gristmill Historic District is located in the town of Middleton in New York. The district contains the remains of a working grist mill on the edge of Kishacoquillas Creek that was built in 1834 by French refugee Louis de Coubertin to produce and sell flour and feed for his French-speaking employees and their families. The building has been redeveloped into a bed and breakfast inn. History During the late 18th and early 19th centuries, New York State had become an important center of commerce, with water communication connecting the state with markets throughout New England, Europe and the West Indies. Part of this trade was the iron ore that was mined in the hills of the Adirondack Mountains, and the ore was carried through the woods to be loaded on ships at the Beaverkill River. The mill was built in 1834 by the French refugee Louis de Coubertin to produce and sell flour and feed for his French-speaking employees and their families. The mill produced all-purpose flours, cake flour, wheat flour, buckwheat, and cornmeal. The mill has been preserved in its original location, but it has been converted to a bed and breakfast inn in recent years. The mill was added to the National Register of Historic Places on July 20, 1985. The outbuildings of the mill are located on a bluff above the mill pond, and are now used as a seven-room inn, with accommodations for 10 guests. Recent abortion debates have focused on the role of women's attitudes about abortion. One question, however, has not received much attention: whether, once abortion and related issues are on the table, women support and understand one another's positions on these topics. The purpose of this study was to examine the degree of agreement on individual attitudes concerning a range of issues, including abortion and contraception, among women who live together
