I know you can simply run arbitrary commands with a C++ program by invoking `execv(2)`. Is there a standard function that allows you to do the same thing but for arguments like in shell? Something like: `char* argument1 = "blah"; char* argument2 = "blahblah"; char* argument3 = "blahblahblah"; system(arg1, arg2, arg3);` In other words, is there something like `system` in C++? If not, is there something like that, but built-in into the C++ standard library? A: `std::system` — Dereferencing `cout` There is a standard interface called `std::system` to perform system calls, typically invoked via the `cin`, `cout` and `cerr` streams, see `cppreference` on `system` as well as various standard books. The library includes functions that allow the programmer to interact with the operating system, typically by reading and writing data from the console, i.e., from the standard output, and from the standard input. Although the functions may be used by other developers as well, you shouldn't do that as it's not the standard way to program in C++. Use the stream interfaces for input and output, `cin/cout` as well as `cerr/clog`, see here for more information. The effect of alpharadin (BBr1e) on the survival of rats with Ehrlich ascites tumor.
