Internet Regulations Recommendations The following is an article by Fred V. Bartel; reprinted by arrangement with The New York Times from The New York Times (January 5, 1996). The recent recommendations by the government in Warsaw, Poland, on internet regulations is a welcome and timely effort to address one of the great concerns of free speech advocates. Proposals made by a special United Nations panel to regulate and monitor the internet have been met with an outpouring of disapproval by organizations across the political spectrum. Internet control groups have taken the lead, with their demands for an open internet ahead of any specific rules. The nongovernmental organization, the Internet Society, which has received the largest campaign contributions from the internet industry, was a member of a 12-member government panel that prepared a 94-page report outlining the need for the much-discussed new rules. The Society's president, David Clark, said: "It's clear from the report that the impetus for regulation is not about regulating the internet, it's about controlling the free internet." The report was generally criticized, however, by such groups as the Center for Democracy and Technology and the Electronic Frontier Foundation, both of which called the document "dangerous." The report's author, Michael B. Gerrard of the University of Michigan Law School, has received between $90,000 and $150,000 in campaign contributions, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. He recently announced his intention to resign from the panel, saying that he was receiving "intense criticism" from people he thought might be sympathetic to free speech concerns. The recommendations will be circulated to the United Nations' General Assembly this month. The proposals include a requirement for all internet service providers to establish and maintain an archive of their customers' online communications, along with other surveillance tools. The services would be required to provide in-depth information on individual users' online activities. A broad set of rules governing defamation and other charges would be laid down, along with the methods for dealing with child pornography, spam and other objectionable and offensive material. Major differences between the U.N. regulations and suggestions made in the United States in February 1995 by the Federal Communications Commission are already apparent. Among them, the U.N. proposals call for far-reaching powers to monitor private communications (which is prohibited in the United States), impose controls on third parties who provide private communications services, maintain data on private users on all users'

What's New In Adobe Photoshop 2021 (Version 22.3.1)?

Theresa May's only priority is delivering Brexit, Boris Johnson has said – in an apparent attack on the prime minister's new plan for a 'common rule book' with the EU in the future. The foreign secretary, seen as a possible successor to Mrs May, said she would no longer try to sell a 'limited' Brexit deal to MPs as 'the only option' for leaving the EU. And he said that Mrs May's plan, which is intended to get her Brexit deal through the Commons, would see the UK signing new trade deals with more than 40 countries after a transition period. 'There's only one question that matters to the prime minister at the moment, and that's whether or not we get Brexit delivered,' Mr Johnson told LBC Radio. 'There is no plan B, there is no other option to the plan that we put to the British people, that is for the UK to leave the European Union. 'The only question that matters to the prime minister at the moment is, first, deliver Brexit, and secondly, to start looking at what happens after we leave. I think she's decided that no deal is a price worth paying to leave the European Union.' The comments from Mr Johnson come amid reports that he is furious at Mrs May's plans for a 'common rule book' with the EU in the future, saying that it would lead to Britain staying in the single market. The foreign secretary said it would mean that Britain would have to abide by EU regulations in areas such as labour, employment and environmental legislation. He told LBC Radio: 'It is very clear that the prime minister has no interest in a good economic deal, she's not worried about the economy at all. She does not want a good economic deal because it would lead to a soft Brexit – and a soft Brexit is what she doesn't want at all. 'What she wants is to stay in the single market. She wants to be in the customs union. She wants to be able to sign the Trade Bill, or whatever it is called, and be able to sign it with 40 other countries. Boris Johnson said he saw little point in agreeing a deal with the EU and then a transition period, as it would mean the UK would be bound by a raft of EU regulations (file picture) 'And what she wants to do is to stay in the single market. And that's a route to the borders of Scotland.
