Hide description Please note that in order to calculate the monthly payment you have to enter the payment value. The minimum payment is $0.00.// // Generated by class-dump 3.5 (64 bit) (Debug version compiled Jun 9 2015 22:53:21). // // class-dump is Copyright (C) 1997-1998, 2000-2001, 2004-2014 by Steve Nygard. // #import <interface TInlineProgressController : NSObject { } + (id)processInfo; - (id)mainView; - (void)dealloc; @end The definition of a class is a "generalization" of its instances. In mathematics, an instance of a class has a particular structure (e.g., a value of a specific type or a condition), and a class is a generalization of this structure. The definition of a class says something about the instances of that class, regardless of their structure. I've been thinking about this definition of a class, and I think I've come up with a good mathematical example that illustrates it. Suppose I tell you the following: I'm interested in people who wear red T-shirts. My friend has a cousin who is interested in people who wear red T-shirts. I'm sure that there is at least one person who fits this description. This doesn't tell you anything about whether the cousin fits this description. The structure of people who wear red T-shirts can be defined in multiple ways. It could be defined as the set of all red-shirt-wearing people (in which case, only one person fits the description). It could be defined as the set of all people in the world (in which case, no one fits the description). But the definition of the class people who wear red T-shirts tells you something important about the instances of this class: It implies that the cousin fits this description. It doesn't tell you anything about whether the cousin fits this description. Here's another example. A bakery in New York is making a cake. A cake is a rectangular solid that is edible. A bakery is a place
