Firefox Review: Guard Your Privacy

By Not Using Add-ons In a normal world, Firefox add-ons are something that you don't really want to be using.

The main purpose of having them installed on your browser is to improve the user experience or, in other words, to give your browser a bit of an edge over your other options out there. Of course, there's always going to be the element of risk when it comes to using these programs. You may never have thought that this applies to you, but it turns out that just because you're not using add-ons, it doesn't mean that you're not walking down a road of privacy violations. Not only that, but you're also probably not aware of the fact that you're putting your privacy at risk in this very moment. Shed some light on the shady side of add-ons and set yourself right While there are a lot of legit reasons for installing and using add-ons in your browser, and while there are legitimate add-ons out there, there are also malicious ones, which can make their way into the hands of the wrong people and, as such, you should always be mindful of what kind of programs you have in your browser. Taking your privacy in your hands? If you want to learn more about the shady side of add-ons, then just take a look at how easy it is for them to track your browsing habits and, from there, stalk you. Considering that most of the add-ons out there have a pretty good reason for being

The 72-hour rotation policy for the National Football League changed in 2002 with a goal of reducing injuries and enhancing player safety. Previously, there were two categories of players — starters and backups. Now the player in a backup spot on a roster is allowed to play up to eight games in a season. In total, the rules stipulate that a player can play 12 games in a season, in contrast to 16 games in the past. According to “Football Play,” a landmark study of football injuries, football injuries are a significant risk to players' health. Although the risk of injury is difficult to quantify, football is a violent sport. As a result, players sustain injuries that lead to a reduced quality of life and a higher risk of early retirement. The researchers found that one-in-five NFL players suffered a shoulder injury in a given season, and shoulder injuries were the most common injury sustained by NFL players. The 72-hour rule in the NFL limits the amount of time that a player in a backup role can be forced into the game. The researchers found that in any given week, a backup is likely to play three, four, or more times. They also suggest
