The company's in-house cloud computing solutions, dubbed "Red Hat Cloud Infrastructure" or "RHCI", are released under the open source Red Hat Enterprise Linux (RHEL) open source project. Red Hat said that it has renewed its commitment to cloud computing, in the form of launching Red Hat Cloud Infrastructure (RHCI), with new market initiatives in cloud-native applications and OpenShift. It wants to be a "project-agnostic" cloud platform provider, through emerging technologies such as containers. Moving to OpenStack is part of the company's cloud transformation. Red Hat Cloud Infrastructure (RHCI) is the first Red Hat commercial offering to leverage the company's relationship with the OpenStack community. RHCI is built on top of the OpenStack Foundation's (OSF's) OpenStack distribution. Red Hat said that the latest version of RHCI will be available as of mid-April. "The transition to a cloud-first culture has generated significant demand for pre-configured, enterprise ready solutions," said Alejandro Martinez, product and solutions management director, Red Hat cloud infrastructure and Red Hat

BT LSF 1250 : 1) LSF 1250Â .Q: Adding a new column to a dataframe based on a condition in other column I'm looking for a way to add a new column to a dataframe based on a condition in a column. I can do something like this: df[df['column_a'] == 'a'].copy(['column_b']) I also know how to use np.where to handle a condition based on multiple columns, but this is a different scenario. I'm looking to add a column based on a simple comparison to another column, and the result should be applied to every row in the dataframe. df['column_b'] = np.where((df['column_a'] == 'a'), df['column_b'] + df['column_c'], df['column_d']) This doesn't produce the desired result, because it applies the condition only to the first row and then the second row gets overwritten. What is a good way to do this? The result should be a new column with the value calculated from df['column_b'] + df['column_c']. A: In order to get a new column with
